Resilient love in a time of hate: a Sunni Patterson reader

Shifting the paradigms around what is the norm is a process we all take part in. Our culture has absorbed the idea that to be dominated and to be made helpless is a natural occurrence in the eyes of history, our authority has become a formal mimicry of this history, but if there is one thing we have all been taught, it is that we cannot beg for liberation from the same forces seeking to oppress us.

A Magic Trance Manual for Technologically Stressed Third World People

There's nothing uncommon about reshaping history. New media bears witness to the pastiche of historical events grounded in the ubiquitous quest for power. There's the recurring narrative centering on the hegemony of Zion and the West. There's the parallel account aligning expeditions of conquest coupled with indigenous resistance factions in decolonized terrain, including Asia, Europe, Africa, Canada, Latin America and the Caribbean. These histories repeatedly pronounce power of few over many. Power contracts and expands over territory through revolution out of tribe and empire however, by definition, power must possess the duality of the empowered and the dispossessed.

One must appraise the power of empire as creativity in a lower form, and seek a definition of the term outside of the political which takes into account some five million years of existence without entertaining presumptuous denial over the classing of others.
What then is power, truly?
Power is universal, it is elemental. In modern physics it is accounted for in the introspective impulse of the singularity.

Merriam Webster defines it as "ability to act or produce an effect".

Creativity which yields resistance is by nature short-lived but power is resilient, it endures.

Though history may facilitate the rise and fall of many, few things are remembered:

1. There is a power outside the realm of your control.
2. There is wisdom other than yours.
3. There is a world outside of you.

"Like the stones resound with the memory of what precedes ruins, primordial forces attest to the transience of human life.
Illusion is giving permanence to something flickering in and out of existence."

A sustained line of inquiry into the world's oldest visionary tools sheds light on the essence of power as being a natural constituent of all life whose core reflection is consciousness. In this way power can be taken away as much as experience can be stolen.

It is an array of powers across all cultures that accounts for the intransient, vivified, unobservable aspect of the world within us as it takes place in the world around us.

The world by virtue of these ideas and practices changes from within and furthermore, by this reasoning one may assume power in fulfilling one's obligation to the satisfaction of the soul. Satisfaction here may be through social change as in revolution, but revolution by its very nature must be brief.

Revolution, like the pressure valve on a hot pot is fairly simple to engage, to be revolutionary, on the other hand, requires a depth within oneself. The most resounding emanation of power is to know oneself - as it is present at birth and as it shifts beyond death. To relinquish power is to allow the external world to determine who you are.
